Last week, the Palestinian Authority made a similar swap, releasing three Israeli Arabs in exchange for kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit, who is currently held in an Egyptian prison. The announcement, expected to be made Sunday, will come only days before a new round of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks in Washington, D.C., between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas. "We have been sitting at the table [negotiating peace] for two years and haven't seen anything," said Meir Javedan, an Israeli-Palestinian peace activist. "Our political leaders are busy playing political games in America, and meanwhile, the people of Israel are suffering. There's no economy, no jobs. All the nation wants is to be returned to a normal life and return to normalcy." Javedan, from the grassroots Israel Peace Advocacy Movement, explained that Israel has tried for years to work with the Palestinian Authority, but the two sides have been deadlocked for years. Both sides, he added, are focused on their domestic political agendas. "We do believe that the peace process is the right thing to do, but the problem is the people on the ground, the Israeli and the Palestinians, are very divided," said Javedan. The negotiating sessions in Washington, he added, are only about scoring political points at home. One of the most recent peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian

Authority, in August 2010, lasted six hours and resulted in an "unevenly distributed peace accord." Javedan said that the two-state solution, with a Palestinian state along the 1967 Green Line — that is, the demarcation line that existed between Israel and the Gaza Strip, West Bank, and Golan Heights, before the Six Day War — is the only real solution. "The Palestinians cannot be considered as separate from Israel," Javedan said. "We have two states, and not one state and a half. We cannot be one country and not the other." a1d647c40b

The remarks by Deputy Secretary of State Antony Blinken and a report on Syria by the administration's senior advisors followed a Syrian government advance last week that reportedly killed more than 100 civilians in the city of Homs. Blinken told reporters at the State Department that Assad's government continues to try to kill civilians, even though it's losing battles. He says President Barack Obama made it clear in a July 30 interview that the U.S. supports efforts by the Syrian opposition to achieve a "transition" to a new government. "We have never been opposed to the opposition being able to participate in that political process," Blinken said. The administration's senior advisors said in a report released Friday that, "Syria is fast approaching the point of no return. Without a solution to the conflict, the Assad regime will increasingly lose legitimacy, support and credibility within Syria and in the region, threatening the stability of the country and the region." They also said Assad's government must end the use of military power to brutalize the Syrian people and instead use the "political tools at its disposal." The White House has said Assad and his inner circle of advisers are responsible for the violence that has killed more than 30,000 people in Syria. The violence erupted in March 2011, when hundreds of thousands of Syrians took to the streets to protest the Assad family's four-decade rule and its policies in the Arab Spring-inspired revolt. Violence has continued ever since, spilling over the Syrian border into neighboring countries. Earlier this month, Russian President Vladimir Putin sent his top diplomats to Damascus to discuss the conflict. The three men met for about 90 minutes with Assad. Putin
